

Why give up a good thing? I am a very busy stay at home mom and like the fact that I do not receive all of the annoying telemarketing calls while I am busy with the kids cooking breakfast, lunch, dinner, changing diapers, changing clothes, doing laundry, cleaning the house, playing outside, etc. Get the point??? If I want to receive calls from casino's or vacation places in Florida telling me I've won a trip, I'll contact them. I don't want these calls. Especially when I look at my caller id log and see that the same place has tried 5, 10, or even on days 20 times to contact my home. Couldn't these places be considered harrassing me? Also, if I want credit card insurance or other special incentives with my credit card companies, I will contact them. I don't want them contacting me. I don't want calls offering me credit cards, mortgages, credit lines, magazines, cell phone services, etc. I can't tell you how nice it is to know that when the phone rings, it is a friend, family member or business call that I am expecting. There are ways companies can contact you without the telephone. There is e-mail, mailings, newspaper advertising, television commercials etc. If these companies are as good as they think they are, they will reach us respectfully. Also, before I was on the do not call list, I could never contact the company back. There was never a phone # listed in my caller id log, or if the # was listed, it was unreachable. I never found that fair. Don't give up a good thing. I like not receiving all of the annoying calls. Sometimes it would be up to 10 a day. That is unnecessary and inconsiderate of my families time together. If calls are allowed back in our lives, they better make a way for the consumer to see the telephone # calling them, so that they can call the # back to tell the company to stop calling my home. Also, the caller id should show the name of the place calling, not Unknown name or Anonymous. I obviously am not anonymous, why should they be? I can't believe that the FCC would consider getting rid of NJ's do not call law. What are they thinking? They should be working on the problem of people still talking on their cells phones while driving, even though it is against the law.
